Section A: Comprehension (20 marks)

Read the passage below and answer the questions.

The Power of Play

Many people think that play is only for young children, but play is important for people of all ages. Children learn important skills through play, such as problem-solving, creativity and communication. When children engage in activities like building, painting or imaginative games, they develop both their minds and bodies.

Play also helps children learn how to work with others. For example, when children play in groups, they practise sharing, taking turns and resolving conflicts. These are important life skills that help them build relationships.

In today's world, many children spend more time on screens than playing outside. While technology can be useful, too much screen time can limit physical activity and social interaction. Experts suggest that children should have a balance between screen time and active play.

Parents and teachers can encourage play by providing opportunities for creative and physical activities. Simple activities like playing with sand, water or art materials can support learning and development in a fun way.
